Saying and Doing.

"Oh, if I had a million dollars," all longingly the poor man hollers, "how I would help poor hungry mortals, and fill their lives with smiles and chortles! I'd spend my time unearthing cases where want had ground the poor men's faces; from widows' eyes I'd wipe the briny, and make all orphans' days seem shiny." And if in after life he gathers a million guilders of his fathers, to help the poor he isn't ready to spend a single maravedi. "I don't believe in giving money to make the poor ones' lives more sunny," he mutters, with a stern defiance; "it FRATERNAL INSURANCE spoils their sense of self-reliance. The more you give your hungry neighbor, the less he'll buckle down to labor. He'll think the gods are watching over, to see that he abides in clover. We D. C. Superintendent Addresses pauperize the workers willing by handing them the unearned shilling. And then we pay enormous taxes-my tax forever greater waxes-and out of that the town officers of Order Pledge Support to or county should show the poor some kind of bounty." And other platitudes he mumbles, as to the bank he slowly stumbles, all loaded down with clanking roubles which will relieve no poor man's troubles. WALT MASON.

When a promise is given fulfillment should follow. To tell any person that a cure awaits any habit is to play lide and seek with exact truth, especially where cures are promised through the agency of medicines. No medicine ever did, can or ever will cure a habit; but medicines will assist mature in throwing off conditions. The Kin-Po Remedy is a veritable poison classer—an internal Turkish bath; and where a person has given rein to a passion or a habit which has depleted the system and poisoned mind and body, no remedy on earth is so efficacious and satisfactory.
